Call for Papers:

Beginning Dadasaheb Phalke’s Raja Harishchandra (1913), the Indian film industry, during the last hundred and six years, has traversed a long way, transforming itself into fruition in terms of themes, techniques, music competing at times with, what is popularly known as the Hollywood films. Being the fifth largest, producing about 1600 films a year in twenty languages, the Indian films are most popular in the world in being the means of entertainment thereby evincing perceivable influence on the youth. While technology enabled the films in enhancing fantasisation and fictionalisation, the themes of the Indian films, in contrast, are steeped in banality. The thematic transition over the period through mythological, family oriented, nationalistic, under world, political, bio-pics, among other, have been in tune with the social transformation. But what is of interest is, excepting the parallel and realistic films of Satyajit Ray, Adoor Gopalkrishana, Shyam Benegal, B. Narasinga Rao, whatever be the themes, the story lines revolve around the dramas of family, romance, politics and love, while its European and Western counterparts are by and large about adventure, sci-fi, innovations, technology, perseverance and reason. Indian Cinema, popularly known for songs and masala (exaggeration) are less in realism and reality, subordinating and making the women desirable and discardable objects. While in the novels, for example, women are portrayed as the ones capable of being independent and liberal, the Indian films portray women as playing second fiddle to heroes, as stereotypes playing the roles of the servant maid, the mother, the sex object. In spite of being the subjects of teasing, insults and humiliation, women are portrayed as ultimately giving in to the overtures of the heroes.

The proposed seminar is aimed at examining the Indian films from the viewpoint of the social, cultural and historical construction of women in terms of gender, sex, gender ideologies and gender sensitisation. The papers may problematise the identities of women vis-à-vis culture, caste, ethnicity, nationality and sexuality in contrast to the women in life, who play important roles in production, agriculture, industry, nationalist movement, politics and modernisation. The image of women in films needs to be studied as contrary to that in society as can be seen, for example, in women autobiographies. The women centered films like Deepa Mehta’s trilogy Fire, Earth and Water, Revathi’s Phir Milenge, Mehul Kumar’s Jaago, Rajkumar Santoshi’s Lajja, Prakash Jha’s Mrityudand, among others may be an exception. The seminar deliberates on the complex relationship between women and cinema providing a platform for the discussion, and the papers may be on, but not limited to, the following:

- Gender in screening the novels
- De-constructing Gender roles in films
- Gender policing in Indian films
- Films and Feminism
