About the Seminar

Ethical issues in microbiology are related to processes and procedures during the laboratory work and on the data/reports they generate for the patients or in research. There is pressure to perform, which is exerted by both, the community, as well as peers. It has therefore become increasingly necessary to recognize the facts that unethical actions might be a frequent reality. Since some of these activities generate serious ethical concerns, both in practice and research, it is necessary for microbiologists to be aware and equipped to meet these issues in a prepared and measured way. This is an attempt to educate all the microbiologists on the ethics that one should follow.
